Tag: Charlotte von Römhild The aforementioned semester has brought to light the differences in academic standards in different countries. While there is undoubtedly academic competition between universities, not all universities are designed in the same way and have different goals. While some universities offer solely undergraduate degrees, others offer graduate degrees as well. After the first two weeks of lectures, I quickly realized that while some universities are still growing in academic rigor, others are already established. For this reason, I am going to distinguish between the two, where appropriate, in order to clarify the differences. For most Americans, the first question to ask is “what do I want to study?” For many other countries, the question is more complicated. In Germany, students first begin to seek a placement, which consists of an offer for a specific place of study. After completing the placement, students will begin looking for an individual university. Because of Germany’s recent reunification, universities that were previously separated are now combined under one umbrella. Therefore, most German students first look for a placement in an institution within their country before finding an institution that meets their specific needs. This placement may be for an undergraduate or a master’s program. Most English students seek a placement, called an offer, during their first year. This will determine their first year of study. After completing the first year, students will find an institution in their specific country that matches their specific needs. In the second year, most students will begin seeking a master’s program, which is a research program or a course with a focus on a topic of interest. These students will also begin to find a specific master’s program to match their desires. These placements are usually sought after after the start of the application process. Students will not have to complete a placement in order to apply to a university. However, as with many things in the application process, if you are to receive a place at the university of your choice, you will need to have secured a place. If you have an offer or a placement, you will apply to the university of your choice in the same manner that a European applicant would. Once all requirements are met, you will be placed. If you do not have an offer or a placement, you may enter into the application process. You will have to complete the application first. While the application process varies between countries 82157476af
